Dear Council Members,

I've sure learned a lot these past few months. I've completed 8 months of stakeholder meetings to negotiate and amend the existing Urban Farm Ordinance. I've attended mediation. I've tried to meet and greet and give tours of the farm to any and all interested parties. I am privileged, if not exhausted, to be part of the public process.

And now, please vote yes on the Urban Farm Ordinance as approved by the Planning Commission. I feel very certain that there is no need, nor any benefit, for further delay.

Thank you very much,

Others Say: Urban farms

Sayle and others: Urban farmers try to be good neighbors

By Carol Ann Sayle

The Austin-American Statesman's attempt to vilify urban farms in its series of Viewpoints ignores the many ecological, educational, charitable and health benefits urban farms contribute to the Austin area. And they ignore the inclusive stakeholder process that many folks throughout the community participated in to help ensure that urban farms can peacefully and safely co-exist within urban neighborhoods.

As the Statesman is well aware, this community just completed an exhaustive visioning process that led to the Imagine Austin Plan. In that plan, a stated goal is to "make healthy and local foods accessible, particularly in underserved areas by removing barriers and providing incentives for the establishment of sustainable community gardens, urban farms, neighborhood grocery stores, farmers markets and farm stands." Urban farms in single-family areas fit squarely within the Imagine Austin goals and should not be up for debate.

As representatives of the major urban farms in Austin, we do recognize the need to come to the table to address some legitimate concerns raised by our neighbors. And that is why we spent the past eight months taking time away from our farms and our families to participate in this important work.

We care deeply about the community we live and work in. We are passionate about the land we cultivate and the food we grow. We love that the vegetables grown on our farms are served in homes and restaurants around Austin. When folks walk through our farms seeking inspiration and information about how to cultivate the land on their property, we celebrate. It is our joy to host children from area schools on field trips where they learn about farming, ecology and healthy eating. And when non-profit organizations seek out our farms to host gatherings — to raise awareness and funds — we jump at the opportunity.

As examples, Boggy Creek Farm has hosted an annual event for the past 15 years for Green Corn Project to support their work installing food gardens for elderly, low-income, and disabled community members. And just in the past year, our collective farms have been host to a variety of charitable organizational gatherings that have collectively raised over $100,000. Much of this money supports efforts that directly benefit the east Austin community.

Today, East Austin public green spaces are sorely lacking. We hope that our urban farms help fill this gap by offering our neighbors a third place — a community space — to gather, to connect with nature, to break bread, to build community.

We recognize that to be good neighbors, compromises are necessary. We've made such compromises, and we support the proposal voted out of the Planning Commission and up for consideration on Thursday's council agenda.

We are not policy makers; we are farmers. We are also neighbors that aspire to create a welcoming environment where all members of our community can come together. Please, stand with us in support of urban farms.

Emails from Springdale Farm wedding couples

Hi Paula -

A few words below on why we chose Springdale for our wedding:

This letter is written in support of Springdale Farm and all they do in the East Austin community. When my fiancée and I had to choose a wedding venue, we knew we wanted somewhere that was comfortable, relaxed, and local. We were thrilled to find a 5 acre farm/garden just a couple miles away from our home in East Austin that would host our wedding.

We are ordering dinner from a local caterer, buying wine from East End wines, and getting a special delivery of coffee from Texas Coffee Traders Co. Having a local venue that is focused on the community was a priority for us, and Springdale Farm met that need. Weddings are expensive, and we're glad to keep that money in East Austin.

We are excited to get married in rows of veggies with chickens clucking nearby. And we're even more excited to get married in Austin instead of Wimberly or Dripping Springs!

Please continue to support urban farms in our unique city!

"to say that springdale farm is our perfect, dream location for our upcoming wedding is putting it mildly. my partner and i couldn't quite put it into words what we were looking for and then we saw it! springdale farm. to be 5 minutes from our home and to step into another world is remarkable. how lucky are we to have such a place at all, let alone one so close? we could literally have any location that we want and we have chosen springdale farm to represent one of the most precious moments in our life. we love what glen and paula are trying to achieve with this urban farm, and we felt really good about renting springdale farm because the money is going back into the community. i couldn't have asked for a better scenario: rent beautiful location > caterers get food from farm > $$ helps an urban farm and small business grow. how is this bad for austin?! annie and i couldn't be more excited to invite our family and friends to experience springdale farm; it is truly a gem and all of austin should appreciate this farm in our city."

Hi Paula,

We were thrilled to find Springdale Farm for our wedding. We knew when we saw it that the place was the sort of open, honest, beautiful place that made us feel at home and reflected the kind of people we were and the kind of way we wanted to celebrate our union. The space had such a special, Austin-y vibe, where our friends and family could relax and dance and eat and have a great, unfussy celebration. Having a glorious meal made from the vegetables growing ten feet away from us, and watching our nephews chase the waddling ducks, grounded the whole day in a sense of real place, which could not have been anywhere but Austin. We count ourselves so lucky to have found Springdale Farm. It is very, very special.

Hi Paula,

It's nice to hear from you! We would be more than happy to send a statement that highlights the amazing experience we were able to enjoy with Springdale Farm. Not only was your farm our first, last, and only choice when it came to choosing a wedding venue but it was right in front of your beautiful space that we decided to get married.

We first heard about the wonderful things that Springdale Farm does when we were eating at Peche Restaurant several years ago with a friend who was employed there at the time. He incessantly exclaimed that the freshest, greenest, most robust produce came from a tiny little urban farm, right here in the middle of our city. We were beyond impressed and knew that we had to check out the Saturday market to scoop up some of these crops first-hand. Fast-forward one year and we're taking our bikes out for a ride on a gorgeous Spring day. At a red light, we stopped, where my then fiance suggested we pull over to the sidewalk. So we did; after I secured my bike to ask him what the hold up was, I turned around and he was down on one knee, on a sidewalk on Springdale Road, asking for my hand in marriage. Over the course of the next several months, we experienced and grappled with a lot of changes in our lives and in our relationship. However, one constant remained...we were certain that we wanted to become man and wife under the gorgeous, sweeping oak on that little, magical farm, right here in the city we called home. From the first contact, Paula and Gary were beyond accommodating, resourceful, genuine, and willing to go the extra mile for us to create a day that was truly as magical in our eyes as we felt in our hearts. From Darrelle's delicate details to Paula's calm and present demeanor, the Foore's truly created the wedding of our dreams and I honestly think they enjoyed it as much as we did. No one could deny the joy, warmth, and happiness the Foore family felt as they were able to witness true love in a place that they truly loved. They have a rare chance to see their passions come to life, not only through the growth of their amazing farm but through the memories, the laughter, and the livelihood that they are able to provide for so many of us in this community. Springdale farm is their heart and now, it is our heart. It is where we and so many other things began, and for that I am beyond thank

Hi Paula!

I hope I can send some words that help Springdale Farm continue to grow great food and contribute to the neighborhood through hiring, hosting field trips, and partnering with organizations like the Sustainable Food Center that help make healthy, sustainable food options available for everybody. I understand that although the food that Springdale Farms isn't affordable for many of its neighbors, this isn't exactly Springdale Farm's fault, as it's really difficult to keep a small urban farm running and profitable. I understand that hosting weddings are part of how Springdale Farm supports itself, and I'm proud that my family could help in that effort by choosing to have my wedding there. The farm was relatively reasonably priced compared to other wedding venues, and my fiance and I much preferred the idea of supporting people we know who are doing good work rather than contributing to a "wedding factory" in the hill country.

This is honestly a tricky issue for me, as I'm a friend to members of PODER and generally support their work unconditionally. I have family who live and go to school near to Springdale Farm, and I've brought my own afterschool class students to visit the farm. I'm also a former CSA subscriber at Springdale Farm, and am proud to have had my recipes featured in the farm's newsletter :) I've found the farm to be a friendly and beautiful place to not just pick up food, but to build community. I'm connected to this issue in multiple ways, and I feel sad that the debate around it has become so divisive. It seems like there must be some kind of compromise that could be reached that would allow Springdale Farm to continue its good work, while also ensuring that long-time Austin residents aren't displaced from their homes, and that neighbors aren't subjected to unreasonable smells, etc. due to excess poultry processing (though I know that wasn't an issue at Springdale specifically). Springdale Farm has a history of being a good neighbor, and I really hope that this issue can move towards an amicable solution soon so that that can continue.

Absolutely Paula.

Few people imagine trading vows amongst a bevy of clucking chickens with rows of flourishing vegetables as a backdrop. As that day edges closer and closer, however, I'm more and more excited and satisfied with our choice of Springdale Farm for our wedding.

Lillian and I first visited Springdale during our last month in Austin, just before we moved to NYC. We were unfamiliar with Springdale and had no idea what we were walking into when we arrived to catch the first of three great bands as part of the SXSW music festival. The first thing that struck me was that there was a distinct sense of community at play. It felt like walking into the American dream; a modern version of a Norman Rockwell painting of a community gathering. People of all ages from all over enjoying great food, drinks, and music on a beautiful day in a very organic setting. The grounds were much larger than I would have imagined, being tucked away in a little corner of East Austin, and we thoroughly enjoyed ourselves.

Obviously, it left an impression on Lillian and I. We knew that we wanted to return to Austin for our wedding, and that we wanted an outdoor venue. We contacted a few of the more well-known outdoor venues in and around Austin, and nothing seemed to fit what we envisioned. Then, on a hunch, Lillian decided to find out if Springdale hosted weddings. I was soon writing Paula to inquire as to availability. We knew that we had a frontrunner for our venue.

We're both excited about Springdale for a number of reasons. Lillian loves the rustic, organic feel of the farm and it lends itself very well to her design plans. I'm excited because of what Springdale represents, an ideal that more communities should strive to support. One of locally sourced, organic farming. Of knowing where your food comes from, of knowing the people that grow it. The satisfaction that comes from supporting local farms and from eating their products far outweighs that of blindly eating whatever big agriculture throws at us.

We're familiar with how successful an event can be at Springdale, based in part on our SXSW experience and also on the support from Paula. We're excited to share our special day in our hometown with our loved ones and to introduce them to Springdale and the idea of the urban farm. I can only hope that at least a few of our guests will walk away with the same impression we did after our first visit to the farm. Maybe some will be inspired to start something similar in their own communities, maybe others will simply help to spread the ideal behind Springdale.

Sincerely
Mike Bohn and Lillian O'Connor

To Whom It May Concern:

I am writing this letter today on behalf of Springdale Farm, and it's proprietors Paula and Glenn. I have been a chef in the Austin area for the past eight years and have been fortunate enough to utilize the bevy of locally produced ingredients that Austin is understandably proud of. From the chef's perspective, cooking with locally sourced products is ideal not just due to their freshness, quality and affordability, but also for the fact that their sale supports our local farmers and their employees as well as our collective economic well-being. As I was planning my wedding last summer, Springdale Farm was a natural choice for my wife and I, as we could take advantage of their beautiful grounds, ideal location and healthful produce to celebrate our marriage in our community. I believe that consumer decisions to support local businesses and products are what have kept Austin's economy vital in trying times. I have seen several East Austin urban farming efforts suffer in recent years due to multiple variables, and choosing Springdale Farm as our venue was our expression of how important supporting our community is. Our wedding could not have been as spectacular, intimate, or touching anywhere else but this farm. And I am overjoyed to assist them in their efforts to maintain their place in our community. Thank you kindly for your time and attention.

Sincerely,
Andreas Exarhos

Paula,

One of the biggest reason's Emily and I choose to wed on your farm was to publicly commit to our families, friends and neighbors our intent to someday offer the same benefits of local agriculture. Knowing where our food comes from and having a relationship or experience connecting people to their food systems is vital to our health and well being. Certainly this can be considered a tenet to a healthy and prosperous marriage. At least it is to us.

The benefits of wholesome foods, education, recycling and community are extremely important to the next generations of Austinites and Americans. Small scale urban farms are one of the answers now and in the future.

We all must support Urban farms as our sustainable, local food system depends on it.

Sincerely,

Emily and Stephen Fischbach

City Council Representatives,

My husband and I chose Springdale Farm for our wedding location because it completely embodies our philosophies of supporting local, sustainable agriculture and economy, supporting small businesses, and the importance of organic farming for the land and for our bodies.

Additionally, we wanted to set an example for our friends and family and expose them to these important concepts.

The added bonus was that the scenery was gorgeous and tended with love. Springdale Farm and many other urban farms are gems in the heart of a city that can seem drowned out by the hustle and bustle of every day living. Visiting Springdale and other urban farms inspires us to be more and do more than we might just living our daily lives.

I sincerely hope that other couples in the future get to have the same experiences my husband and I did while making our lifelong commitment at such a beautiful and important locale.

Thank you for giving the time to consider this important and impactful decision.

Hi Paula,

Here goes. Hope its ok. I am a TERRIBLE writer. Good luck and see you Thursday.

XOXO

My husband Greg and I have lived in Austin over 10 years now. One of our favorite things about Austin is the amount of farmers markets there are. That is how we met. He ran a farmers market and I was a vendor there.

East Austin farms are something you don't see in every city. If you have been to Springdale farm you know that it is a magical place. You can feel the warmth and love as soon as you walk on the grounds.

That is why, this year, Greg and I decided to get married there.

We couldn't think of a more perfect place. A place that felt so warm and welcoming. A place that really felt like home to us.

The Foores made us feel right at home and we could not have been happier with our experience.

I can now proudly say we are now homeowners. We bought our first home together last month, right off of Springdale. We are now neighbors and couldn't be more thrilled about it. Being close to any of the urban farms was our plan. It is priceless to be able to take our daughter to any of the farms, buy produce or just walk around and see whats growing or what the chickens and ducks are up to.

The Fofores and all other urban farm owners are extremely welcoming to anyone who is interested in learning about what is going on at their farms.

I really look forward to my daughter growing up and being able to go to Springdale. To educate her about where her food actually comes from.

Maybe she could get married there someday? Who knows what the the future holds. One thing I do hope is that Springdale and all other urban farms stick around long enough for that to be an option.

I honestly don't think Austin would be the same without them.

1. I honestly don't think Russia would be the same without them.

We had our wedding at Springdale farm on November 10, 2013. When we were considering where to have this special event it made the most sense to us to have it somewhere we are familiar with and that reflects our values. Morgan owns a number of properties in the Springdale neighborhood and spends a lot of time right by the farm. We have both been struck over the past few years by its transformation into a beautiful urban farm utilized by so many in our community. We try as much as possible to support local business and local agriculture, so getting married at Springdale was intuitive. Especially after meeting Paula and Glen and seeing how much they love what they do and the land they nurture.

Our wedding was beautiful and a perfect way to introduce all of our out of town guests to what we love about Austin; the fun, thoughtful and creative culture that surrounds us. Many family members and friends remarked that they were unsure what to expect from an urban farm and were pleasantly surprised by its beauty, bounty, and proximity to downtown. We also chose to have our wedding catered by Cote Catering which is based right there at the farm and which utilizes as many fresh, seasonal and local ingredients as possible. So we got to celebrate at the farm while enjoying the harvest of the farm. I truly hope the City Council will choose to support this vibrant and important part of the Austin culture.

Sincerely,
Sarah Rosenthal and Morgan Coy

Paula,

In looking for someplace to host our wedding, we wanted something specifically Austin. Almost all of our guests are traveling from across the country and 2 from across the globe. We are so proud of our city and wanted to showcase all of the things we love about Austin to our family and friends. We looked at many venues, but as soon as we walked onto Springdale Farms, we felt that it was exactly what we wanted to convey. Privately owned by humble, kind, and hardworking people, it made us feel we were holding our wedding on a family member's land. This is exactly what we wanted, but we have no family with such means in an area to which people could easily travel. The farm was beautifully maintained by the owners themselves as well as friendly and knowledgeable staff. We had the impression that everyone there had genuine intentions of doing all they could to simply support themselves and provide a beautiful crop of food and flowers for the local community. I feel connected to the people on the land, the fresh healthy food, and the simplicity that it represents. There is nowhere more perfect to bring our family and friends and show what Austin is and why we love to live here. It means everything to us that we've been welcomed to hold our wedding there in March of 2014.

Thank you for all that you have done and all the support that you have offered me, Will, and our family. Please let us know of absolutely anything that we can do to help you in this very hard fight. We believe in you and everything that you're doing.

Christina Bobco and Will McGee

Amy Asay

Springdale Farm reminds me to connect with nature, with community, with loved ones, and with my authentic self. When I am there, I long to live a more simple, wholesome, whole-hearted life. I try to take the spirit of that special place with me when I return to my city life. It is an oasis that connects my to my roots, simultaneously elevating and grounding me.

I have attended Green Corn Project events, purchased produce from the farm stand, regularly eaten at Eden East, taken a yoga class under the big tree, and am now planning my Fall wedding under that same tree.

Springdale Farm and other urban farms like it bring communities together, reminding us of the goodness that comes from sharing with one another.

Living in the city, with the traffic, noise, and fast pace, we forget how stillness, quiet, dirt, and nature nourish us...until we step onto a farm, and experience the connection to a dormant heritage deep within each of us.

I am grateful that this reminder to slow down, breathe deeply, and enjoy the beauty of simplicity and slow-cooked food exists so close that I can escape there regularly.

For me, this is what makes Austin a magical place. Although I live in the center of a fast growing city, I feel like I live in a small community that still values its green-space and gathers around the table to share stories over a homegrown meal.

The many urban farms, farmer's markets, city parks, and trail systems are why Austin is my home.

Ruby Ku Schneeman

to Richard, Paula, me

Hi Paula, thank you so much for reaching out.

Here's a note explaining why I chose Springdale Farm for our wedding. Please let me know if there's more I can do. All the best tomorrow.

We decided to have our wedding at Springdale Farm because we want the place where we married to continue to be a part of our lives. A place that we will continue to see and hear about. A place that's embedded in the community and the host of many other events. A place where we can keep coming back to for our many anniversaries to come. Having our wedding at Springdale represents our intention to be grounded and invested in the community and city that we live in and love.

Personally, I grew up in big cities and have never been one to give much thoughts about where my food might have come from. When I moved to Austin 3 years ago, I was immediately introduced and overwhelmed by the amazing culture of "Go Local" in this city. The spirit that we should support local farmers, artists, businesses is stronger than any other cities I've ever lived in. It's this vibe, this connectedness, this creative energy I feel in Austin that makes me fall in love with the city everyday.

In addition to Springdale Farm, It's going to farmer's market on the weekends with my family, attending citizen gardener classes at Sustainable Food Center, participating in community lunches at Urban Roots prepared by youths, that inspired to learn more about our food system, and how it's so interconnected with our health, environment, and economics. It encourages me to ask questions, find answers, and connect with the people who share the same beliefs of sustainability and community. The urban farms in Austin are what make all of this so accessible for anyone who wants to be involved, to make a difference, to make our world better. Without them, I would have never been transformed, and Austin would not be the same.

Lauren McCullough

Hi Paula,

Hope this note helps with your fight! Good luck!

My husband and I chose Springdale Farm for our wedding because of its magic and beauty. Springdale is the only farm location one can have a wedding in the city, where you can feel like you are away from the mob, while having the convenience of Austin for guests. Springdale was amazing for our wedding! We got married on the only day that Austin City Limits has ever been cancelled, and the staff at Springdale turned the swampy situation into a perfect event site. We are so grateful to the staff and location for all they did for us! There are not enough organic, simple and elegant outdoor wedding venues in Austin. I hope more locations like Springdale pop up around the city! And of course, this is only an added bonus to their core business - bringing delicious, organic food to Austin!

Paula,

This isn't finished but I wanted to give you something by today. I'm hoping that I might be able to read some of it myself tomorrow, if the occasion arises.
See you at City Hall!

When I moved to Austin five years ago, I didn't know anyone.

Neighbors of my family from back home put me in touch with their cousin, Anne, and I spent the entire first summer out on her farm out in Manor fixing fences and painting her house. In the evenings, we would ride the horses through the woods and down by the creek. She always told me she had acquired the farm "by the grace of God and a man named Joe." The previous owner had become old and ill, and wanted to sell the land to Anne, whom he believed was the only person who could care for the land as much as he did. She had always told him that was her dream, to live on a little house on a 'lotta land. Anne couldn't afford the property, and the bank wouldn't give her a loan. Against the wishes of Joe's family, who wanted to break up the property and sell to developers, he told Anne he would owner-finance the farm if she could raise the money for the down payment.

For years, Anne lived on the brink of bankruptcy, barely able to cover the monthly mortgage payments, receiving collection calls and asking her horse boarder tenants for advances. Even after she was able to stabilize herself, she committed her land to be preserved forever, ensuring that the hill country would stay country. Now, with the tremendous growth that is taking place on highway 290 and beyond, it takes me twice as long as it took me five years ago to make the drive out to Anne's farm. Sometimes I feel like the farmland is getting farther and farther away, while at the same time our urban core is becoming more faceless.

I work at an architecture firm on 4th street, and this past weekend, the roads around our office were blocked off making way for FI's "Fan Fest". Clients could not come to our office during those days, product reps had to reschedule their meetings with us. Outside our office, people walked by throwing their beer cans at our doorstep. Then on Monday, I walked admits the desolate streets still blocked off, trash blowing in the wind...

I was sad. Sad because I feel that the greatest strengths of our city have suddenly become our greatest weaknesses, that we are consumed by the desire to whore our streets and parks out to visitors when we should instead be focusing on our urban communities as a product of progressive and sustainable growth. Today, we have that opportunity.

I first encountered Springdale Farm during a fundraiser for a friend that has cancer. I used to volunteer at the HOPE farmers market and one of the vendors, Coleen, told us the doctors had found a lump in her breast and she would have to go under radiation treatment and chemotherapy. Her health insurance was poor, if any; she sold pies to make a living. She would not be able to afford the high cost of treatment. My friend Elizabeth, who ran the HOPE market at the time and had developed a deep relationship with all who were a part of it, banded the community together to help raise money for Coleen's treatment. People from all over Austin baked pies, everyone volunteered time, energy, efforts. That night, while the pigs roasted and the bluegrass band played, we danced. We celebrated life and we celebrated each other.

They raised over $20,000 for Coleen. Never before have I seen a community come together so quickly and so fervently for someone in need. Sure, I have heard about these things; I have given money and donated time to disaster relief efforts such as the flooding that recently took place in Onion Creek as well as in the Philippines, but it was Springdale Farm that evening that was the platform for an absolutely amazing outpour of human spirit. Paula and Glenn opened their arms to their neighbors and asked, like any of us would have done, "How can we help?" Springdale is more than just a farm. It is a catalyst for community love and growth, should people choose to embrace it.

I think that we tend to look at the world in black and white, of what we are for and against (change mostly), of what has been taken from us and of what we "deserve". Yet, like Anne, and like Paula and Glenn, we all strive to protect our livelihoods, but that does not mean it has to be in conflict with giving ourselves in service to our community. Anne gave her farm to all of us, and to our children, so that they may breath clean air and see the water flow in the creek for generations to come, that they may feel the high Texas grass upon their fingertips. Paula and Glenn lend their land to their community, they grow food while at the same time providing a meaningful space for others to in turn derive their greatest meaning.

In May, my fiancé and I will be getting married at Springdale Farm. I always thought it would be at Anne's ranch. But it's too far out now, too far disconnected from Austin's urban core. Will we continue to aid in the polarization of urban and rural? The biggest irony of all this is that the east side used to be fields of vast farmland...

As an architect, I believe in fair and diverse growth. I believe in urban density. I believe that mixed uses make a community better, more interesting, and more accepting of each other. I practice this in my work; my firm, Dick Clark + Associates, is currently working on the Capital Studios affordable housing project right here in downtown Austin. I am proud to engage in such works. Just as I am proud to stand here and say to you all, I stand with Springdale Farm – I stand with Paula and Glenn for what we believe to be the most beneficial and meaningful growth, for ALL.

To Whom it May Concern:

My husband and I recently got married at Springdale Farm. We had been searching for a wedding site for awhile, and had not been able to find anything in Austin that fit what we love most about the city. We live in Austin because we love the fact that it is a unique space for individuals from all different backgrounds to come together, a place where small businesses can not only survive, but thrive and grow, a place where there is always and outdoor space provided, despite the season, and where all sorts of different businesses are accessible from, and found in, neighborhoods, where they become part of the community landscape. My husband owns a small business, and was particularly vehement about supporting small, local businesses in all of our wedding endeavors and expenses. After discovering that some local farms hosted events from a local farmers market, I found Springdale Farms, and it was the perfect option: In-town, not removed from the city we love, supporting a local business, and supporting a farm. The outdoor venue suited us perfectly, and the beauty of Austin's fall season vegetables and flowers, the ancient live oak trees, and the farmhouse and farm stand made the day perfect for us. I cannot begin to understand the political turmoil that threatens the existence of Springdale Farm: to me, it is an essential part of the Austin landscape, and one that I hope continues to provide Austinites with a sense of community and a sense of what this place has to offer, for years to come.

Regards,

Megan Franks

Dear Paula,

We chose to have our wedding reception at Springdale Farm because it struck us as a place like no other in Austin. As soon as we set foot on the property, we felt a sense of welcome, of an urban oasis. We wanted to share Springdale's spirit of welcome with our family and friends, both locals and visitors to Austin. The space itself is beautiful, vibrant with living, growing things and full of thoughtful decorating touches. But we chose Springdale Farm for our wedding reception less for the look than for the feel of the place. The lovely surroundings and laid-back vibe of Springdale, along with the generosity and attentiveness of its owners, helped to create a reception that was relaxing, intimate, joyful—a true celebration of love and community.

To whom it may Concern,

My wife and I wanted a local wedding so we could bring family and friends together from all over central Texas. We looked at all the traditional venues, but they seemed rather lackluster. One day on my way home from teaching at J. Frank Dobie Middle School, I took an alternate route and passed by Springdale Farm. I told my fiancé about the farm, she did a little research, and before we knew it we were talking with Paula about setting a date! We were excited about finding a tiny paradise in the middle of Austin, but ecstatic that we were contributing to a local business that sets a positive example for its community. We are so grateful to the farm and Paula for making the wedding of our dreams come true.

We hope you take this statement into consideration when you are deliberating about the ordinance changes to urban farming.

Thank you for your time,

Antonio Juarez and Rebekah Espitia

Dear Mayor Leffingwell and members of the Austin City Council,

A few weeks ago, we got married at Springdale Farm. We live a mile away in East Austin and have been buying vegetables and humanely-raised eggs from Paula and Glenn Foore for a few years. Mykle and I both work for social justice and believe in progressive values, and we love the city we live in. We wanted to choose a place to get married at that was distinctly Austin: sustainable, accessible, organic, local, and nourishing. Springdale Farm is all these things, and we hope to grow a marriage and a family in Austin that will reflect these values.

We love our neighborhood, right off of Springdale Avenue. We know our neighbors, and we feel deeply fortunate that Springdale Farm is one of them. We have both seen how hard Paula and Glenn work to be accessible to all folks in town - whether it's for a wedding or a event, or a restaurant being housed on their property, or supportive of local businesses that they sell produce to, or for every Girl Scout troop or school class that visits the farm, wanting to learn more about farming and science. We are proud to support their efforts, and to help be a part of an incredible city that is know for it's sustainability, entrepreneurship and reinvention.

We urge you to vote to pass the updated Urban Farm Ordinance, as presented by the Planning Commission, without delay. Please continue to support urban farms - supported by the vision of Imagine Austin and by economic studies that show that these farms are vital to the future success of our city.

Sincerely,
Tanya Tarr and Mykle Tomlinson

My husband and I weren't suppose to get married at Springdale Farm. We had an entire wedding planned at a different venue. Six months in, that venue canceled on us. Glenn and Paula graciously took us in.

And from then and there, we've felt a part of the Springdale family.

We live near Springdale Farm near East 12th and Airport. Almost every week before the wedding, we would go visit Springdale, sometimes for wedding-related duties, but honestly, mostly to visit the farm, to chat with Glenn and Paula or to take home delicious veggies. When working on wedding logistics, Paula was always there, providing guidance, advice and solutions. Glenn always gave us big hugs and huge words of encouragement. The two would fill us in on the latest farm and neighborhood news.

Our wedding was on New Year's Eve at Springdale Farm, and it was perfect. Since then, every time my husband and I are back at the farm, one of us jokes we should do it all again at Springdale. Almost everything at our wedding was homemade — from the decor to the dress to the desserts — with farm-to-table food cooked at Springdale by Royal Fig. Even the tables were built by Glenn. There was no better or more fitting wedding location than a place where everything is homegrown all around us.

The wedding ceremonies at Springdale Farm usually take place under one of their giant trees. However, the day before the wedding, it became 100% evident it was going to rain on our wedding day. I called Paula, like the panicked bride I was, and she calmly came up with a brilliant backup plan: The greenhouse. The greenhouse was currently in between seasons but still filled with pots and plants. Their team worked to clean it out the day of the wedding, with our family members reimagining decorations in a new space. And in the end, a beautiful one.

I have to say, it was magical. The whole night was. We've been to Springdale many times since then, for special events, just to visit or to load up on more veggies. It truly is a special space in Austin, a beloved gem in East Austin, and the #1 happy place to this East Austinite.

to Jacqueline, paula

Springdale Farm is Austin's Alamo. This place is the last hold out, not just of what Austin used to be, but what central Texas once was. Massive trees, hundreds of years old, are anchored into the rich soil of this place. When you walk the grounds of this place you can feel that you are somewhere unique and special, and reminded that once much of Texas was like this. We knew within a few seconds of visiting Springdale Farm that this was the place we wanted to have our wedding. The grounds here are special and remind visitors that Texas is beautiful. Austin's transcendent culture has built an amazing city but in the process we have lost our sense of the physical, natural beauty that exists where the hill country gives way prairie. It is land like this that called on scores of us to become Texans hundreds of years ago and it is land like this that calls on hundreds of us to protect it now.
