Two-story, rectangular-plan, brick-veneered house in the Italian Renaissance Revival style; hipped roof, prominent brackets at the eaves; semi-circular portico centrally located on the façade, supported by four fluted columns, and with a metal railing above; triple, paired, and single 3:1 fenestration.

The Italian Renaissance Revival was one of several period styles popular from the late 19th century through the 1920s, and was almost exclusively a style for architect-designed grand houses. The style harkens back to the buildings of the Italian renaissance in the 16th century, and is defined by an imposing scale, masonry construction, a hipped or flat roof, a formal, symmetrical composition, use of Classical elements, such as columns, porticos, and balustrades, and heavily bracketed eaves, all of which are found on this house, designed by Giesecke and Harris, prominent Austin architects. Many Italian Renaissance Revival houses had clay tile roofs; the original roof on this house has been replaced by a metal roof.

Historical Associations:

The house was built in 1923, and was designed by the noted local architectural firm of Giesecke and Harris. The house has been the home of several prominent families in Austin, including two judges, one an associate justice on the Texas Supreme Court. George E. and Belle Sydnor Bryson built this house in 1923; its construction was featured in the building section of the American-Statesman. George Bryson was a partner of Malcolm Reed in the city's largest cotton-buying business. Bryson and his wife lived here until the late 1920s, when they moved to Houston. The Brysons were among the most socially important Austin families. Stories in the newspapers detail various parties and other social events peppered with the names of some of the wealthiest families in Austin, including the Reeds, the Rathers, and others.

After George Bryson and his family moved to Houston, the house was owned and occupied by Joe B. and Addie Knight, who lived here until the mid-1930s. Joe B. Knight was a rancher; the house was again the site of many social gatherings that were noted in the society pages of the newspaper. Charles G. Krueger and his wife, Nora, purchased the house from the Knights, when the Knights moved to Corpus Christi. Charles Krueger was a commissioner on the State Court of Criminal Appeals. He and his family lived here until around 1938. They then moved to the McClendon-Price House (a city landmark) on Pearl Street, before moving back to Bellville, Texas, where Charles Krueger became the Austin County judge.

Richard and Nora L. Critz bought the house around 1937, and lived here until Richard passed away in 1959. A native of Starkville, Mississippi, Richard Critz was an associate justice of the Texas Supreme Court in the 1930s and 1940s. As a young man, he moved with his family from Mississippi to Williamson County, where he attended school and studied law. He practiced law in Granger, Texas until 1910, when he became the Williamson County judge, serving until 1918, when he opened a law office in Taylor, Texas. After practicing law in Taylor for 10 years, he was appointed by Governor Dan Moody to serve on the Commission of Appeals to the Texas Supreme Court. In 1935, he was appointed by Governor James V. Allred to the Texas Supreme Court to fill a vacancy. He served as an associate justice on the Texas Supreme Court until 1944, when he retired to return to private practice in Austin. He formed a law firm that had offices in the Littlefield Building, and later had his own solo practice in the Perry-Brooks Building at 8th and Brazos Streets. While on the Supreme Court, he was known for the clarity and logic of his legal opinions, and delivered several opinions and decisions that regulated the state's oil industry. After his death in 1959, the house was owned and occupied by later generations of attorneys.

CRITZ FAMILIAR WITH COURT JOB

By United Press

Judge Richard Critz, who as a small boy walked from Starkville, Miss., to Williamson county, Texas, half a century ago, today became an associate justice of the Texas supreme court.

He was appointed late yesterday to succeed the late Justice William Pierson. At a night session the senate confirmed the appointment.

Judge Critz was expected to take the oath of office today and sit as a member of the court at its regular session tomorrow.

One of the senators who voted to confirm the appointment last night was Sen. Jim Neal. Critz was Neal's assistant as county attorney of Williamson county, where the Laredo senator resided formerly. Later Critz became county judge and served for eight years.

He aided Dan Moody and Harry N. Graves, a present state representative, in prosecuting the Taylor flogging cases that resulted in Moody being elected attorney general and then governor.

As governor, Moody appointed Judge Critz to the commission that aids the supreme court. He leaves that place now to go upon the bench itself. A change of statute now requires the court to name the commissioners, so Judge Critz will have a voice in naming his successor.

Judge Critz already is familiar with much of the litigation pending before the court as a result of his service on its commission. Before removing to Austin to accept the commission assignment, Judge Critz lived at Taylor and Granger. Hunting, fishing and golf keep him unusually fit for a man of 58 years.

His appointment is effective until the general election Nov. 3, 1936. Two supreme court judges will be voted upon then. The term of Chief Justice C. M. Cureton expires also.

Richard Critz (1877-1959)

Associate Justice, Texas Supreme Court, 1935-1944

Richard Critz was born October 16, 1877 in Starkville, Mississippi, and moved with his parents to Central Texas when he was fourteen years old. His family settled in Williamson County, where Critz attended local schools before enrolling at Southwestern University in Georgetown. He studied law privately while teaching school in Georgetown, received his law license in 1902, and began practicing law in Granger that year. In 1906 he was married; the couple had four children.

Critz served as Granger city attorney from 1906 to 1910 and as Williamson County judge from 1910 to 1918. He practiced law in Taylor from 1918 to 1927, when Gov. Dan Moody appointed him to the commission of appeals of the Texas Supreme Court. He served in that position until 1935 when Gov. James Allred appointed him an associate justice of the Texas Supreme Court. Critz served on the court until 1944. His opinions on the state's high court helped establish a judicial pattern for regulating the oil industry, and he was influential in the development of the substantial-evidence rule.

Following his supreme court service, Critz returned to the commission of appeals for a year before retiring in 1945. At that time he returned to practicing law in Austin. Richard Critz died April 1, 1959 in Austin at the age of eighty-one. He was buried in Capital Memorial Gardens.

CRITZ, RICHARD (1877–1959). Richard Critz, lawyer and judge, was born in Starkville, Mississippi, on October 16, 1877, the son of George Edward and Ella (Richards) Critz. When he was fourteen the family moved to Williamson County, Texas, where Critz went to school. He attended Southwestern University for a short time, then studied law in a Georgetown law office while teaching in the local public schools. He was admitted to the bar in 1902 and practiced until 1910 at Granger, where he also served for some years as city attorney. He returned in 1910 to Georgetown to become county judge, a post he held until 1918, after which he continued to practice there until 1927. Around 1920 Critz assisted the young Georgetown district attorney, Daniel James Moody, Jr., in his prosecution of sundry local members of the Ku Klux Klan. When Moody became governor in 1927 he appointed Critz to the Commission of Appeals to the state Supreme Court, on which Critz remained until elevated in 1935 to associate justice of the Supreme Court by appointment of Governor James Allred. Critz's judicial opinions are noteworthy for unusual conciseness and clarity, as well as for their logic and numerical abundance. He helped establish a judicial pattern for regulating the oil industry and was influential in the development of the substantial-evidence rule. He was defeated for renomination in the Democratic primary of 1944 and left the bench at the end of the year to practice law as a member of an Austin firm. On January 18, 1906, Critz married Nora Lamb of Granger; they had two sons and two daughters. Justice Critz was a Democrat and a Methodist. He died on April 1, 1959, and was buried in Capital Memorial Gardens, Austin.

In re: Valid Petition against Historic Zoning for 1602 W Lynn Street

Hon. Mayor and Austin City Council:

We, the undersigned owners of property affected by the requested zoning change described in the referenced file, do hereby protest against any change of the Land Development Code which would zone the property to any classification other than SF-3.

While we recognize remodeling plans will cause the property to no longer be "contributing" to the National Historical District and also believe in historical preservation when it is warranted, we do not believe i) it is in the interest of the neighborhood, or ii) that the property meets the extremely significant threshold of historical associations set by the City Council to warrant going against the property owner's wishes.

The initiation of re-zoning for 1602 West Lynn sets a dangerous precedent of abusing the process as a deterrent to owners of properties that are merely "contributing" and not the highest of historic landmarks. We do not support the rezoning of properties on subjective bias that would lower the bar for the entire neighborhood.

Sincerely,

Teri Taylor

In re: Valid Petition against Historic Zoning for 1602 W Lynn Street

Hon. Mayor and Austin City Council:

We, the undersigned owners of the property affected by the requested zoning change described in the referenced file, do hereby protest against any change of the Land Development Code which would zone the property to any classification other than SF-3.

While we recognize remodeling plans will cause the property to no longer be “contributing” to the National Historical District and also believe in historical preservation when it is warranted, we do not believe i) it is in the interest of the neighborhood, or ii) that the property meets the extremely significant threshold of historical associations set by the City Council to warrant going against the property owner’s wishes.

The initiation of re-zoning for 1602 West Lynn sets a dangerous precedent of abusing the process as a deterrent to owners of properties that are merely “contributing” and not the highest of historic landmarks. We do not support the rezoning of properties on subjective bias that would lower the bar for the entire neighborhood.

Sincerely,
