Reasons, Goals, Strategies for an update to Imagine Austin: Our Equity Vision

The Planning Department acknowledges the history of planning in Austin, and how past planning, including the City's 1928 Comprehensive Plan and redlining in the 1930s produced continued struggle with displacement and gentrification, and growing disparities across all quality of life outcomes, still felt today.

Additionally, the Planning Department acknowledges neighborhood planning, still in place today, covers only a fraction of the city, and even as of 2016 lacked representative decision-making and transparency. Further, those plans were found to be inconsistent with the citywide vision. In sum, some plans in place today have created planning-related outcomes both inconsistent with citywide goals, and planning activities with barriers to representative decision-making.

Planning understands this opportunity to learn lessons from the past and create improvement in plans and planning processes. That improvement must begin with equity in the forefront of the way we plan, the outcomes of the plan, and the implementation of the plan, and must occur at a citywide level, such as with the City's comprehensive plan, and in smaller planning areas of the city.
